SYNTHETIC DRUGS: IS THERE A SOLUTION?

4

Cannabinoids

Synthetic cannabinoids are as they seem synthetic: cannabis or marijuana. It is smoked in the same manner as marijuana in cigarettes and pipes. Though, it is not marijuana. In fact it is dead plant materials, sometimes, even the cartridges mentioned above sprayed with a synthetic THC. They are current sold all over the world in gas stations and new age shops and in other retail locations. They are marketed as incense and once again are not regulated by any US Agency because they state they are "not for human consumption." Common street names for cannabinoids are black mamba, blue, K2, spice, moon rocks or shark.

Cannabinoids have found themselves extremely popular within the younger crowd within the United States; especially since it creates highs that when compared to marijuana and THC is about 50 times more potent. The attempt to regulate and control cannabinoids has failed so immensely that legislatures do not know what the next steps to be taken are. "Drug laws originally did not control synthetic cannabinoids, which were legally obtainable from head shops and gas stations. The Office of National Drug Control Policy and Department of Justice created laws against them but they do not fully regulate usage because new cannabinoid derivatives are constantly replacing banned chemicals in spite." (Wilson, B., B.A., Tinslok, H., M.D., DeCecchi, D., M.D., & Mahoney, V. 2019)

Catbanones

Catbanones are a brand of synthetic drugs commonly called bath salts; it has street names like bloom, cloud nine, ivory wave, vanilla sky and white lightning. They come in forms such as bath salts, plant food, and plant feeders. These products are labeled as "not for human consumption" in turn these ingredients are not regulated by the FDA or any organization for that matter. They are not tested for toxicity and are not regulated in any means. "As long as a
